Disclosure Statement:

1. I gratefully acknowledge salary support from George Washington University (Department of Economics). I also gratefully acknowledge travel support from the International Institute for Economic Policy and the SOAR grant of the Elliott School of International Affairs at George Washington University.
2. In the past three years, I have received income and/or fees summing to amounts in excess of $10,000 from:
 - The World Bank and the London School of Economics and Political Science (for work on a project studying the economic effects of road investments in Sub-Saharan Africa)
 - The International Monetary Fund (for a project studying the effects of housing and transportation technologies on city growth and welfare in developing countries)
 - The International Growth Centre and the World Bank (for works on the returns to human capital in developing countries)

It is my belief that these organizations do not have a financial, ideological, or political interest in the subject matter of this paper, but these institutions work in the field of international development policy, which is intrinsically political.
