“Finally a Smoking Gun? Compensating Differentials and the Introduction of Smoking Bans” by Daniel Wissmann (University of Munich)

I hereby declare that I have no relevant or material financial interests that relate to the research described in this paper.

My paper uses proprietary (or other) data that I am not authorized to post. Specifically, my data are based on German administrative social security records – the Sample of Integrated Labour Market Biographies (SIAB) provided by the Institute of Employment Research (IAB) in Germany and the German Microcensus (survey years 2004-2010). These datasets can be accessed by any researcher after a successful application, but it cannot be made publicly available. For further details see the Readme file for the replication files (openicpsr-120245).

The author gratefully acknowledges funding through the International Doctoral Program “Evidence-Based Economics” of the Elite Network of Bavaria and the LMU Forschungsfonds.
