Financial support for this research. This research was supported by a grant from the Russell Sage Foundation and by the Division of Research and Faculty Development at Harvard Business School. No other financial support was received for this research.

Financial support from interested parties. In the past three years I have not received financial support summing to $10,000 or more, in the form of consultant fees, retainers, grants, in-kind support such as data access, or the like, from any individual, group, or organization with a financial, ideological, or political stake related to this article.

Positions. I serve as Chair of the Board of Harvard Business Publishing, unpaid. Harvard Business Publishing is a not-for-profit subsidiary of Harvard University that sells corporate learning and leadership development content; I disclose these roles because the organization's activities relate to the subject of this article. Neither organization was involved in this research or had access to the paper before circulation. I hold no other paid or unpaid positions as officer, director, or board member of any organization whose policy positions, goals, or financial interests relate to this article.

Close relatives and partners. To my knowledge, no close relative or partner has received financial support from an interested party or holds a relevant position that would require disclosure under the AEA Disclosure Policy.

Right to review. No party other than the authors had the right to review this paper before its circulation.

IRB approval. The survey of chief human resources officers used in this paper was reviewed by the Harvard University-Area Committee on the Use of Human Subjects and determined to be exempt. The other data used in the paper are publicly available or previously collected datasets used in de-identified form and did not require additional IRB review.
